The Carey family not only anened the ald vellow house at Reulah, N. W. last night and held a housewarming, but they also brightened up the Cort The-Atre when its doors were thrown open for the season to permit the entrance of all these holding pasteboard invitations obtained at the door. John Cort put on "Mother Carey's Chickens," and naturally Broadway couldn't help being interested in a play with such a title

The comedy was made over into this year's theatrical mode by Rachel Crothers and Kate Douglas Wiggin from the latter's novel, as it was evident to them that though the book had a large sale there were still hundreds of persons who needed it brought into their lives vis the footlights. Edith Tallaferro was the main bit of fluff, and accordingly was the daughter of the house who was

Story Is Deftly Touched. The story of the play hangs by a read, but Mrs. Wiggin and Miss others have touched the comedy with such bright lines and attractive moments that one hardly bothers whether there is a story at all. The widow of a naval officer with a quartet of two boys and omeer with a quartet of two boys and two girls buys an old New Hampshire ing to the specifications in the "Arabian house from an American abroad, but it turns out he has no right to sell it, because his mother had bequeathed it to her grandson, leaving the will in a letter tucked away in an old stove, right where it could do the most good to the plot.

Tom Hamilton, the grandson, comes to the besuteous Frincess with the pretty seeking this bequest, but unswittingly have cause his mother had bequeathed it to her grandson, leaving the will in a letter tucked away in an old stove, right where the could do the most good to the plot.

Ton Hamilton, the grandson, comes seeking this bequest, but unwittingly he throws the document into the fire because his mind is occupied at the time with the more important matter of Nancy Carey's eyes. Then a misunderstanding springs up between them and he goes away, only to return in time to set everything right by proposing to Nancy, so that all present can give their undistracted attention to the Virginia reel before the final curtain. Just enough of a story, you see, to get a lot of characters together for a very jolly symming.

mendable restraint as the woman whose chief profession lay in being a mother to every one in sight. Helen Marqua got the most out her part as Lallie Joy, but, with due respect to every one, the acting honors went to Ursula Ellaworth as her mother, Mrs. Ossion Popham, the, peesimistic shadow of an optimatic husband well portrayed by Wailace Owen.
